

Aboriginal families STUDY

The Aboriginal Families Study is investigating the health and wellbeing of over 300 Aboriginal families that had a baby in South Australia between 2011 and 2013

Major areas of focus include:

- Mothers' health and wellbeing
- Children's health, wellbeing and development
- Engagement with health services
- Connections to family, community, culture, Country and language.

The information provided by families has been used to inform policy makers and services about the experiences of Aboriginal families in South Australia, and to advocate for changes to services to benefit Aboriginal families and communities.

Aboriginal families STUDY

What we are doing now

We are getting ready to talk to families as the young people in the study are around 14 to 17 years of age.

In the next stage of the research, we will be focusing on the social and emotional wellbeing of young people.

To help us get the questions right, we are inviting young people (14-17 years) and mothers and carers of young people (14-17 years) to participate in a yarning circle or 1:1 interview with Aboriginal researchers.

If you would like to find out more about study, or express interest in participating, please contact us via email or on the phone number below or click on the QR Code.

To talk to a member of the research team:

afs@sahmri.com

Arwen Nikolof: 0493 020 983

Kath Moore: 0491 784 018

